The Subjectivity of Beauty: Different Perspectives and Interpretations

Beauty is a complex idea that changes from one person to another and across different societies and cultures. What research tells us is that beauty is subjective - it takes on diverse forms, influenced by individual likes, traditions, past events, and social settings. Remember the saying, "Beauty is in the eye of the beholder?" It means that what one person thinks is beautiful, another may not. Think about it - a fashion trend in Paris might not make any sense in an African village. This applies to more than just appearances; art, music, and literature, too, vary in appeal. Over time, people's idea of what is beautiful changes with culture and history. Take the Renaissance, for instance, plump women were seen as the height of beauty, symbolizing wealth and plenty. Now, many societies prize slim figures as ideal. Don't forget, beauty isn't just about physical appearance. Look for qualities like kindness, intelligence, or a good sense of humor. These don't fade like physical beauty. As Socrates said, physical beauty doesn't last forever. In books, authors use the idea of beauty to show different viewpoints. The way a character sees beauty can tell us plenty about their values and personality. Bear in mind, that our view of beauty evolves as we grow and learn new things. In the same way, our taste in food can change and expand, and so does our idea of what's beautiful. This changing perception of beauty makes it a journey of learning, thinking, and growing. Beauty isn't one-size-fits-all. It's a complex concept that varies from person to person, influenced by many factors. It's the subjectivity of beauty that makes exploring it such an interesting and enriching journey.

The Senses and the Perception of Beauty

Our bodies have five basic senses - seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, and touching. We use these senses to understand and interact with the world. They also play a big role in how we see beauty. Seeing is the usual way we see beauty. Many of our opinions are based on what we see. We see beauty in nature, people, art, and everyday life. The colors and styles we see not only please our eyes, but they also make us feel joy and happiness. Hearing also lets us see beauty. The beat of music or the calming sound of rain in our ears makes us feel emotions that help us see beauty. We shouldn't forget the effect of a beautiful voice or lovely sound. Smelling is closely tied to memory. A smell can bring back strong memories linked to joy, love, and beauty. The smell of your favorite food or someone's perfume can bring feelings of happiness and beauty. Tasting is often tied to the happiness we get from food. But it also helps us see beauty. Tasting a good meal, a favorite sweet treat, or even a well-made cup of coffee can bring feelings of pleasure and beauty. Touching also helps us see beauty. Feeling a smooth fabric or a light wind in our hair gives a special feeling of comfort and beauty. We can see softness, roughness, heat, or cold as beauty. Our senses don't work alone when they help us see beauty. They join their observations to help us see beauty the way we do. Beauty is a personal feeling, mainly steered by our sense experiences. Pay attention to your senses, enjoy what they bring to your life, and let them guide your perception of beauty.

Societal Factors that Influence Our Taste and Aesthetics

Our likes and dislikes in things like clothes, art, music, and food are influenced by several societal elements. Cultural background is one of these elements that can make a big impact. Each culture gives its people a unique sense of what is valuable or good. For instance, Asian cultures often place a high value on simplicity and minimalism in various areas, including art, architecture, and clothes. Another point is that our society's standards and current fashions decide what we think looks good. The rise of social media has made this even more noticeable, as it allows new fashions to spread quickly. What we consider 'popular' or 'trending' can determine what we think is tasteful. A clear example is how baggy jeans were replaced by skinny jeans as the fashionable choice due to celebrities and social media figures. Education is a third point that can mold our likes and dislikes. By learning more, we gain a better understanding and liking of different kinds of art, music, and food. This makes a person's tastes grow beyond what is comfortable and easy to get. The amount of money we make can largely influence our tastes. Cost can dictate how much we can access and experience different art, music, fashion, and food. Certain luxury experiences, such as collecting fancy art or eating gourmet food, are usually connected to higher income levels. It's a mix of all these societal issues that shape our likes and dislikes. Not only that, but they also change how we act, what we choose, and who we are as people. Plus, these influences are always changing, which means our tastes are always evolving too.

The Final Thoughts

Aesthetics is the study of beauty and taste. It's more than just what looks or feels good to you. It includes different types of appreciation, from admiring nature's greatness to noticing the complexity of math.

Aesthetics isn't just about art, it impacts many areas of life. Simon Blackburn suggests that beauty gives us a kind of satisfaction we feel through our senses, also known as "aesthetic pleasure". On the other hand, taste is the unique way we interact with aesthetics. Kendall Walton calls it "categorical perception". To fully understand aesthetics, we need to explore beauty and taste as closely linked concepts. They reflect how complex and personal our sense of perception is. Maybe aesthetics' real beauty is in its universal yet personal meaning. Experience, understand, and appreciate beauty and taste in your own, unique way. These are endless journeys that we, as people, always pursue.
