Historical context of World War II

World War II officially began on September 1, 1939, when Germany invaded Poland. This act of aggression marked the start of Hitler's expansionist ambitions and set off a chain reaction as other European powers responded with declarations of war. As Germany swiftly conquered much of Europe, Japan sought to capitalize on this chaos by expanding its own empire in Asia.

In the Pacific theater, Japan had already been involved in aggressive actions throughout the 1930s. With its invasion of Manchuria in 1931 and subsequent expansion into China, Japan aimed to secure resources and establish dominance over East Asia. These territorial conquests brought them into direct conflict with other major powers such as the United States and Great Britain.

Simultaneously, tensions were rising between Japan and the United States due to American opposition to Japanese expansionism. The U.S., concerned about protecting its interests in Asia (particularly regarding trade routes), imposed economic sanctions on Japan - including an embargo on oil exports critical for their military operations.

Against this backdrop, Pearl Harbor became a focal point where these escalating tensions culminated. The attack can be seen as both a desperate attempt by Japan to neutralize potential threats from America's naval presence in the Pacific and as an effort to secure resources that would sustain their imperial ambitions.
